The Nebraska State Capitol and the Four Seasons

Artists use colors, flowers, plants and clothes to represent the seasons.

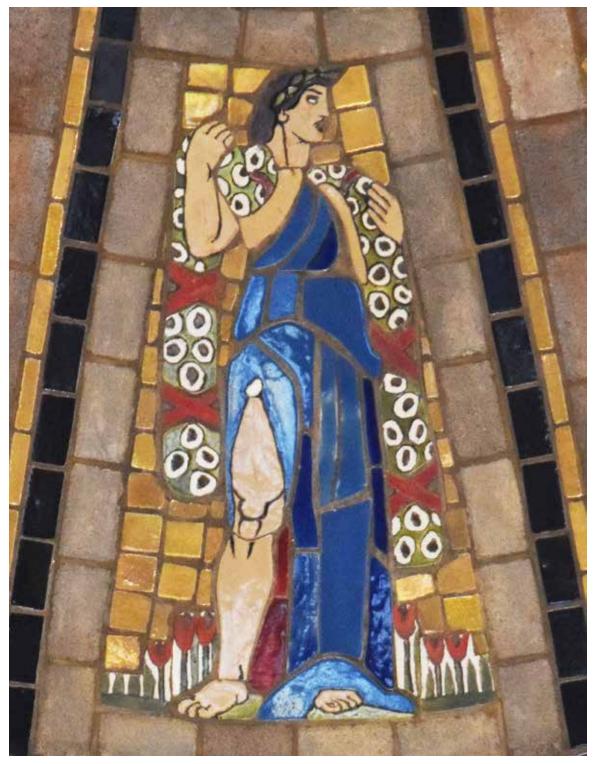

Capitol artist Hildreth Meiere, a mosaicist, created artwork showing the seasons in the Vestibule of the Capitol.

The State Capitol's Vestibule dome has pictures of agriculture and nature in Nebraska.

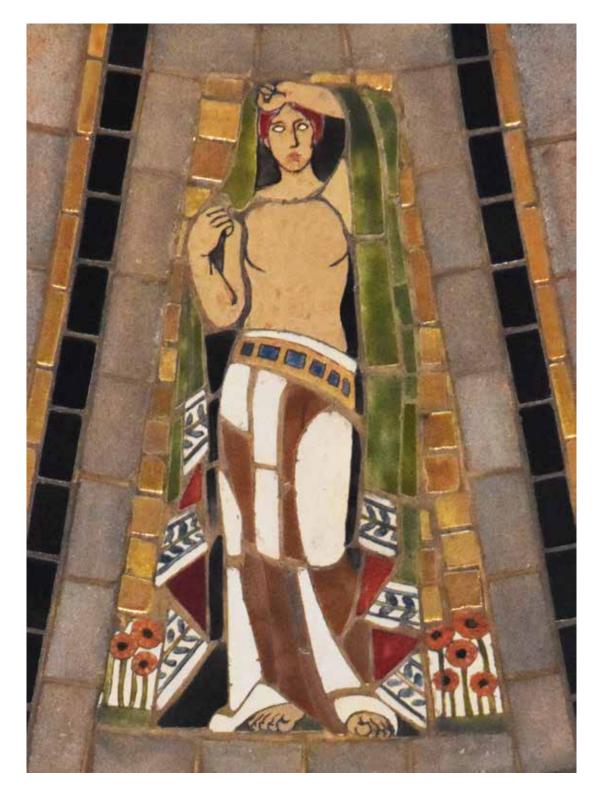

In the center is a large gold tile sun and around it are symbols of the seasons.

The large vertical pictures in the circle have female figures dressed in clothes to show the seasons.

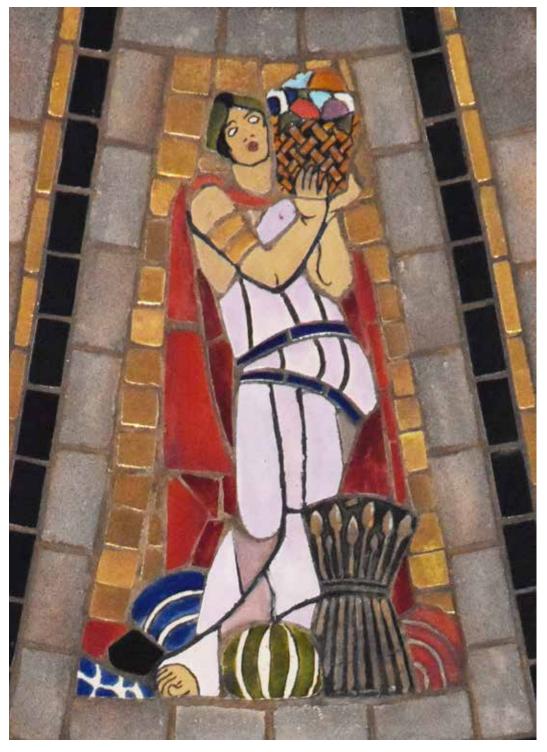

In this picture of SPRING there are flowers at the figures feet. The flowers look like tulips that grow in Spring.

Spring is when the earth warms up after winter, the figure doesn't need a cloak to keep warm but has a scarf that looks like flowers.

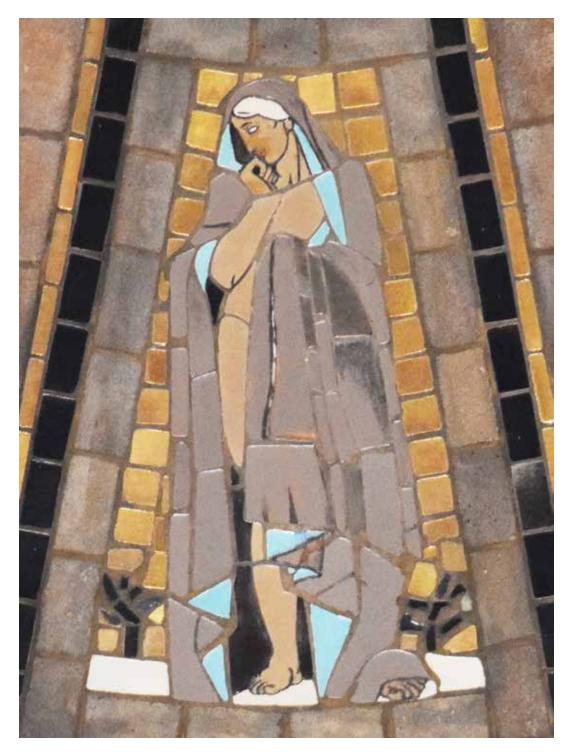

In this picture of SUMMER there are flowers like poppies and daisies that grow in summer at the figure's feet.

In summer the sun shines bright and hot. The figure holds a cloak over her head for shade.

In this picture of AUTUMN the figure holds a basket of apples, plums and pears. Grains, fruits and vegetables are harvested in the Autumn. Pumpkins, squash and a bundle of grain are at her feet.

The figure has a cloak, but it is open because there are still warm days in autumn, so she wears a hat to keep warm.

In this picture of WINTER there is snow at the figure's feet and small black trees. Trees lose their leaves in winter.

Winter has a cloak around her. She has her hood on and is trying to keep warm.

Draw a line from the season's name to the picture of the season.
